

The Calm After the Storm

Weekly Report Nineteen 01/22/18-01/28/18

Things calmed down a significant amount during week nineteen. However, there was still a lot to get done. The original work was turned in, which meant that the original work assessment needed to be completed. Not only was the original work assessment due this week, but so was a typical assessment. This meant that this week was calmer than the ones prior but still busy.

The original work assessment was an eye-opener. It showed many things about the original work. This includes how much work was truly put into it and how much it shows about the learning and growth that has happened throughout Independent Study and Mentorship. Being able to see these things was exciting because it created a feeling of accomplishment surrounding the original work, to know how much has truly been completed.

While the original work is completed, there is still more to come and more to think about. The final product is already coming up and an idea is needed soon. However, before the final product proposal is due, the original work speech needs to happen. This will require a presentation and practice in order for there to be the necessary growth from the last speech. In the midst of all of this, there is still a need for mentor visits and research. With all of these upcoming projects and events, procrastination needs to be avoided at all costs. This has not been the case in the past weeks. Procrastination has been a common event. The only way to move past this is to use time in class wisely and to keep track of everything that is coming soon.
